Tibetans at high altitude in India show a growth pattern similar to that previously observed among Tibetans in Tibet. There are no discussion topics on this book. Furthermore, consistent with Among the Tibetans, alleles increasing offspring mortality were selected against whereas those increasing offspring survival were positively selected. Tibet's economy depends largely on agriculture. Despite this constraint, this study shows the necessity to study phenotypes of locally adapted populations in their native environments to correctly identify the adaptive phenotypes. The most widely used family of approaches aims at detecting new beneficial mutations that were quickly driven to high frequency or fixation by natural selection, a model that is often referred to as selective sweep and that is likely to apply to adaptive alleles of large effect Among the Tibetans 5 – 9].
