Parrington, V. As Theron indiscriminately mixes the rhetoric of the pulpit and the marketplace, language itself becomes a subject of the novel. When he surprises Celia in her room, she rejects him, telling him how objectionable she and Forbes find his behavior. The feast includes singing, praying, and speeches. She plays him songs on the piano and later slips into a robe. He does take note that she has made good friends with Gorringer. I would rate it as a forgotten classic of American realist literature.
